Marxism Unable To Whip Nature

CPYRGHT

Washington Bureau,
Des Moines Tribune.

WASHINGTON, D. C.—Allen W. Dulles, director of the central intelligence agency, believes the reason behind the visit of Russian farmers to Iowa and Minnesota is that "Karl Marx wasn't much of a farmer."

Communist Party leaders, Dulles said, tried to force the party line on corn and wheat when they made the Lysenko doctrine of "development through environment" the basis of the official farm policy. It didn't work, and now they're looking for a more realistic approach.

MARX.

"Development of corn and of better wheat strains proved remarkably resistant to the teachings of Marx and Lenin," said Dulles. "In the end, Nature won."

Didn't Work

Senator Morse (Dem., Ore.) is fond of saying the senate once considered passing a resolution applauding the horse that kicked him in the head. Now he has a new story about his animal troubles.

Recently, one of the sows on his 65-acre farm in Maryland produced a litter of piglets with such engaging personalities that Mrs. Morse wanted to hold one in her arms. Defying an old barnyard rule, the senator tried to sneak one of the pigs away from the sow—and had to dive over the fence to escape her furious charge.

A few days later, says Morse, he received a letter from one of his critics. "You see," the letter said, "even the hogs hate you."
